

Dow Jones Reprints: This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. To order presentation-ready copies for distribution to your colleagues, clients or customers, use the Order Reprints tool at the bottom of any article or visit www.djreprints.com

See a sample reprint in PDF format.

Order a reprint of this article now

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL.

WSJ.com

OCTOBER 15, 2010, 9:24 A.M. ET

NY judge: 9/11 workers could get extra $47.5M

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Thousands of workers who cleared mountains of potentially toxic rubble from the World Trade Center site after 9/11 have been offered a collective $47.5 million to drop lawsuits they filed against the government authority that owned the towers.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey agreed to settle after months of negotiations with a law partnership representing many of the laborers, police officers and firefighters who participated in the cleanup.

U.S. District Judge Alvin Hellerstein, who is overseeing the litigation, revealed the settlement in an order filed Thursday. He called the deal "fair and reasonable."

The arrangement, which would cover 9,055 rescue and recovery workers, is still subject to approval by the Port Authority's board, which next meets on Oct. 21.

Each worker must decide on their own whether to accept their share of the settlement, or reject it and fight for a larger award in court.

The money would be added to an earlier settlement of suits filed against New York City that could be worth as much as $712.5 million, if enough plaintiffs agree to sign on, bringing the total pot to about $760 million.

Thousands of the public and private sector workers who put in time at the trade center say their exposure to the thick clouds of ash and pulverized building materials made them sick.

Many have reported respiratory problems similar to asthma. A smaller number have complained of more serious, debilitating respiratory conditions. Others aren't sick now, but worry they may fall ill in the future.

Paul Napoli, a lead lawyer at the firm that negotiated the deal, said in a written statement that he and colleagues at Worby Groner Edelman & Napoli Bern were "elated" by the agreement.

The Port Authority declined to comment.

Under the terms of the deal, the less seriously ill workers, or those not sick currently, would qualify for payments ranging from $2,000 to $3,000. The rest would divide the remainder of the $47.5 million based on the severity of their condition, and the likelihood it is related to World Trade Center dust.

Like the earlier settlement covering the City of New York, the deal is contingent on its widespread acceptance by the thousands of plaintiffs.

At least 80 percent of those with weaker liability claims, and 95 percent of those with stronger claims, would have to say yes for it to take effect.

That standard is slightly looser than one imposed in the larger settlement, which requires a 95 percent opt-in rate among all plaintiffs. Workers have until Nov. 8 to say yes or no to that deal.

Plaintiffs in the suit had argued that the Port Authority, as the owner of the trade center site, was at least partly responsible for ensuring that people working on the cleanup were fitted with filtered masks to protect their lungs.

—Copyright 2010 Associated Press

Copyright 2009 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com